

Last year, Indiana passed a "no call" law to prevent telemarketers from contacting individuals who place their name on the no-call list. Prior to placing my name on the list, I regularly received 5 or 6 calls a week from telemarketers, usually at dinner time. Since that time, I receive 1 or 2 calls per MONTH. Indiana's No Call law has allowed me to enjoy uninterrupted family dinners. It has also allowed me to do away with my caller i.d. feature I formerly used to screen unwanted calls. As a very happy Indiana resident, I would request the FCC to abide by stricter state laws when proposing national standards. I would be strongly opposed to any national standard lower than what I currently enjoy.
